arginine requirements for rapid growth of broiler chicks can be satisfied by the oxidation of nitrogenous catabolites. The chicks were fed diets containing 30 or 40% glucose plus an amino acid mixture sufficient for 10% growth (55 or 62 g crude protein and 260 g metabolizable energy). The diet containing 30% glucose and a 3.8% mixture of arginine, aspartate, glutamine, glycine, and asparagine was deficient in one or more essential amino acids.

Metabolizable energy was not limiting at either diet level. At both levels of the energy-supplemented diet, liver lipogenesis and lipolysis were increased, and plasma triglyceride concentrations were reduced. Chicks fed the diets containing 30% glucose and the essential amino acid mixture did not gain weight faster than those fed a diet containing 30% glucose and a 3.8% mixture of arginine, aspartate, glutamine, glycine, and asparagine. The chicks fed the diets containing 40% glucose and all essential amino acids grew at the same rate as the chicks fed the diet containing 40% glucose and 30% arginine. In a third experiment, a diet containing 30% glucose was fed to chicks that were fasted for 48 h before a feeding trial. Liver lipogenesis was decreased by fasting but was not further reduced by the removal of amino acids. These results support the hypothesis that some of the glucose requirements of chicks can be satisfied by the oxidation of nitrogenous catabolites. is the
