Of course I could just do some kind of raw socket manipulation, but that's hacky, so I'm looking for a more elegant way of achieving this. Basically what I want is to inspect any kind of input, and modify or remove it, as needed. A: Use JNI to access the C function in C and to implement your Java methods in C. Use getenv to store sensitive data (as a double quoted string) and protect it from the JVM. Use a JNIEnv reference (JNI_CreateJavaVM) to create the environment and JNI_GetCreatedJavaVMs to get a pointer to a list of existing JVMs. Use the JNI functions to interact with the environment (JNI_SetEnv), to the C library (dlopen) and to the Java class (JNI_OnLoad) to load the classes you need. That one is not a good sign.. by that, I mean that its a bad sign that I'm finding the game hard to control.. that's usually a sign of too much drugs. Am I just getting plain old weird then? I'm very sorry to hear that. I can't for the life of me remember what it is, but you must be very, very, tired of my constant devouring of them! It's a cockatrice, another enemy of dragons. And yes, you are getting more unusual, but it is my job to spot the dragons in the Bad Places. You're very brave, indeed, to post in an RPG! You do know that you can edit your posts after you post them, don't you? If you post about dragons before you've finished the dragon quest, you will be in trouble. I've known lonely young writers do this before. Various systems are known which provide accounting
